SCHOOL OF MEDICINE

Introduction

Americans spend in excess of $20 billion annually on herbal and dietary supplements, most often without the guidance of a health care practitioner. Many clinicians require timely, evidence-based tools for discussing the risks, benefits and regulatory issues related to the use of natural supplements.

During this informative and comprehensive CME conference, renowned faculty will present a concise, clinically relevant overview of natural supplements in evidence-based practice, with an emphasis on disease states. This event is a must-attend for clinicians wanting to acquire the knowledge and expertise for addressing and managing dietary supplement use.

Educational Objectives

After attending this conference, participants will be able to:

- Examine, through evidence-based summaries and case discussions, key herbal and dietary supplements used in clinical practice, including their indications, side effects, interactions and contraindications;
- Understand the latest supplement developments through original research presentations;
- Gain tools for effective supplement discussion, documentation and risk management;
- Recognize the potential role of supplements in the management of common medical conditions;
- Develop resources for independent research of supplements most common in one's practice;
- Discuss the legal aspects of the supplement industry and implication for clinical and research practice; and
- Formulate strategies for effective basic and clinical supplement research.

Accreditation

Total credits available 17.75:

- Thurs. pre-conference seminar 3.5
- Fri. pre-conference workshops 3
- Sat. general sessions 6.75
